Automatic External Defibrillator (AED)

Should I have a defibrillator on my premises?

Defibrillators save lives.

All first aiders know the chain of survival. That of early access, early CPR, early defib, early advanced life support.

A defib allows any member of the public to administer that vital early shock increasing the chances of survival dramatically.

Frequently asked questions

Should this sort of thing not be left to paramedics?

No. You will notice that it is called an Intelligent PUBLIC access defibrillator. In other words, it is designed for any member of the public to use. Of course paramedics should be sent for in the early access part of the chain of survival so that they can get to the early ALS stage as soon as possible.

What if I get it wrong and deliver a shock to someone who doesn't need it?

You cannot. You will also notice that it is called an INTELLIGENT public access defibrillator. A defib works by searching for certain heart rhythms known as fibrillation and only delivering a shock when it finds these. Its intention is not to start the heart again but to stop the fibrillation (hence the name de-fibrillator). If you make a mistake and press the button where it is not advised, the machine will state that it cannot find a shockable rhythm. No shock will be delivered.

Is it a legal requirement that a defib is in my workplace?

Not at the time of writing this page (June 2014). In the UK, we use a system known as the Caparo test to decide culpability in cases such as this. The Caparo test involves 3 points; the likelihood of harm, the severity of that harm and if the employer could or should have foreseen the potential for harm. Obviously in Nursing Homes there is a greater likelihood of a defib being required than in say a nursery. Therefore the nursing home would have a greater degree of difficulty in defending their position than the nursery would in not having access to one. If we use the example of a gym, where cardiac arrests have been reported with some frequency, many such facilities (but not all) have already equipped themselves with AEDs and lives have been saved. Again, whilst no legislation yet exists which enforces the provision of AEDs, the precedent being set by other gyms would make it difficult to for another gym to justify why they did not provide one.

Why choose an iPAD over other well known AEDs?

- While all AEDs do regular self tests to ensure optimum functionality only the iPAD gives a visual life indicator and a manual self test option.
- The same pads are used for children and adults eliminating the possibility of confusion and unnecessary time wasting.
- It is the only defib with an ambient noise detector increasing the likelihood of finding a shockable rhythm where one is present.
- The only defib which provides "handover" information to ambulance crews when they arrive minimising time they spend to ascertain accurate facts.
- Can wirelessly transmit information to a PC
- Verbal and visual prompts to indicate where and when the user should place the pads, stay clear of the casualty and resume compressions.
- 15 year battery shelf life.
- 200 shock battery life.
- Battery capacity gauge.
- Status indicator to show clinical readiness.
- CPR metronome which can be turned off.
- Fluid Ingress Protection IP55
- Carry case supplied
- Status indicators visible when case is closed.
